We welcome you to attend a campus visit of Harvard College. A campus visit consists of a one-hour information session with an admission officer and 1-2 current undergraduate students, followed by a one-hour campus tour led by a current undergraduate student. Please note that the visit schedule is typically posted one month prior to each term and you can select an available date from the calendar at the bottom of the page. There will be no on-campus information sessions and tours on Harvard College holidays, during other college closures and on most school breaks.

Registration

Registration for a campus visit is required. We recommend that you arrive 15-30 minutes before the scheduled visit time. You may cancel your registration at any time. We cannot receive you without registration.

Group Visits/Tours

Visiting parties are limited to groups of 5. For groups of 6 or more, please contact the Harvard University Visitor Center to arrange a visit.

Important information for your visit

Last term, our school held its first drama festival. All classes prepared a short play, and my classmates chose me to play the leading role. At first, I felt extremely worried because I had never performed on stage before. I was afraid I would forget my lines or move nervously in front of the audience.

My drama teacher encouraged me not to give up. She told me that even professional actors feel nervous, and that courage comes from practice. I recited lines whenever I was free, practiced in front of my family, and recorded myself to improve my expressions and gestures.

On the night of the show, I waited backstage with my hands shaking. When the curtain opened, I took a deep breath and stepped forward. Soon I forgot my nervousness and focused completely on the role. The audience laughed at the funny lines and applauded warmly.

After the show, many people praised my performance. That night made me realize that nothing is impossible if you keep trying. This experience taught me the importance of perseverance and gave me much more confidence.

4. Why did the writer feel worried at first?

Over 2,000 years ago, Baiae was the most magnificent resort town in Italy. Wealthy statesmen including Cicero and Caesar were once drawn to its natural springs. But over the centuries, volcanic activity submerged this playground of the Roman nobility — leaving half of it beneath the Mediterranean.

Today, Baiae is one of the world's few underwater archaeological parks open to visitors wanting to explore the remains of the ancient Roman city. A protected marine area, the site needs to be monitored for damage caused by divers and environmental factors. However, explains Davidde, Italy's national supervisor for underwater cultural heritage, "communication underwater is challenging."

Cabled systems are the most reliable, but they are difficult to maintain and cover a limited operational area. And wireless internet doesn't work well in water, because of the way water interacts with electromagnetic waves.

So Davidde teamed up with a group of engineers led by Chiara Petrioli, a professor at Sapienza University. Petrioli's team has developed a network of underwater wireless sensors capable of gathering environmental data and transmitting it to land in real time. The system relies on AI algorithms (算法) to constantly change the network protocol (网络协议). As the sea conditions change, the algorithms adjust the information path, allowing the signal to travel up to two kilometers and data to be sent between transmitters one kilometer apart.

At Baiae, underwater internet allows remote, continuous monitoring of environmental conditions. Besides, it allows divers to communicate with one another and with colleagues above the surface, who can also use the technology to locate them with a high degree of accuracy.

Davidde anticipates that the network will be available to tourists visiting the archaeological site in the coming months. As they swim over the ruins, visitors will use waterproof smart tablets to communicate and to view 3D reconstructions of the ruins.

"Underwater internet has made monitoring of the archaeological site simpler and more efficient," says Davidde. "At the same time, we can offer the public a new, interactive way to explore the underwater park."

8. What do we know about Baiae?
- A. It was famous for natural springs.
 - B. It is a playground for sports lovers.
 - C. It was destroyed by human activity.
 - D. It is unattractive to adventurous visitors.
9. What is the third paragraph mainly about?
- A. Applications of underwater internet.
 - B. Development of underwater network.
 - C. Challenges of underwater communication.
 - D. Conditions of the underwater environment.
10. What is the underwater network capable of doing?
- A. Allowing divers to locate themselves.
 - B. Marking the information path to the surface.
 - C. Bringing new life into submerged Roman ruins.
 - D. Making it easier to monitor archaeological sites.
11. What is the purpose of this text?
- A. To explain underwater communication.
 - B. To analyze the effect of climate change.
 - C. To introduce a new underwater network.
 - D. To promote a new way to explore Baiae.

When visiting a doctor a few years from now, you can expect to be accompanied by a virtual version of yourself.

This might seem like sci-fi, but the foundations are being laid. Researchers in the U. K. have already used computer simulations of the hearts of patients to test different treatments for atrial fibrillation (心房颤动). With other organs also being twinned by scientists, it seems likely that these digital organs will eventually link up to form a virtual body.

The benefits extend far beyond health care. Digital twins are emerging across industries. For instance, they are used to monitor jet engines on airliners, model Amazon's vast supply chain to predict sales, and assist local authorities in managing flooding. Automakers, too, are speeding up development by simulating crash tests and test drives virtually.

Digital twins began as basic computer models of physical objects and systems. As computers have become more powerful, twins have become more advanced accordingly. Complex design and modeling software means that more physical objects take shape in the virtual world. Moreover, with AI in the mix, these twins are no longer passive models. They can predict outcomes, perfect performance, and self-adjust based on new data. These advanced models make it easier for humans to tackle complex problems. They allow people to look into the future, spot problems and test wild ideas without real-world consequences.

However, with these promises come undeniable risks. Digital twins might go wrong when they are programmed badly or hacked into. In addition, digital twins will consume mountains of data, some of which may be wrong, or biased or raise privacy concerns. There is also the danger of tunnel vision if humans rely only on digital twins and thus miss the big picture of what things really are.

These risks, however, are not specific to digital twins. They apply to all emerging technologies, as they always have and always will. Such concerns need to be considered, as in the current debate over the use of AI. The emergence of the digital mirror world will raise new questions, but its potential advantages are already plain to see.

12. What can we learn about digital twins?

- A. They have been only used in hospitals by now.
- B. They can create a complete virtual human body now.
- C. They are applied in various fields beyond medicine.

D. They were originally developed for the auto industry.

13. What is a new feature of digital twins with the help of AI?

A. Replacing physical crash tests. B. Being programmed to avoid risks.

C. Reducing the amount of data needed. D. Adapting themselves using new data.

14. Which word can replace “tunnel vision” in the text?

A. Narrow-mindedness. B. Data sensitivity.

C. Multitasking ability. D. Broad perspective.

15. What does the development of digital twins tell us?

A. Better late than never. B. The devil is in the details.

C. Every rose has its thorn. D. Bite off more than you can chew.

When a medical emergency happens, the first few minutes are often the most critical. Professional help may take time to arrive, but what happens in those moments can mean the difference between life and death. 16 First aid is the immediate care given to an injured or suddenly ill person before professional medical treatment is available. It is not just for doctors or nurses — it is a life skill that every ordinary person should learn.

Many people believe first aid is too difficult or that they might do something wrong. 17 For example, applying firm pressure to a bleeding wound stops blood loss. Leaning an unconscious person’s head back opens their airway and prevents choking. These actions require no special equipment. They only need basic knowledge and a calm mind. Studies show bystanders giving simple first aid double or triple survival chances.

18 When you know what to do in an emergency, you are less likely to freeze or panic. Instead, you become someone who can take charge and help. This sense of control is not only good for the person in need but also for your own mental well-being. Furthermore, it’s beneficial to the spread of first aid knowledge. When one person in a family or a classroom learns it, others often become interested too.

First aid is especially important in places where accidents are common—homes, schools, and sports fields. In fact, most emergencies happen around us like a child swallowing a small object, a friend fainting during a game, or an elderly relative falling in the kitchen. 19 Without it, even a minor injury can become serious. With it, a crisis can be managed calmly and effectively.

In conclusion, first aid is not just for professionals. It is an easy-to-learn knowledge that helps ordinary people act in emergencies. Learning it makes you more responsible and confident. 20

- A. This is where first aid comes in.
- B. In reality, basic techniques are simple.
- C. Next time, you can be the first to help.
- D. You need a lot of money to learn first aid.
- E. Beyond saving lives, learning first aid also builds confidence.
- F. Don't move someone injured if you know nothing about first aid.
- G. These are situations where first aid can make an immediate difference.
